

Research-Based Practices for UDL

The Value of Building Learning Communities

Learning communities form the foundation for action-based learning and support critical and creative thinking across generations.

Learning communities are designed to build relationships and facilitate learning through collaborations with others.

Learning communities provide the practice needed for professionals to develop and increase 21st Century work place skills.

Learning communities provide support for learning content and closing gaps needed to complete coursework through peer-to-peer tutoring, mentoring, and collaboration.

Learning communities provide opportunities for applied learning and problem solving directly related to the field of study.